

“Jack of all trades, master of none” is a saying used to describe a person who knows a little bit about everything. I consider myself a jack of all trades because I am strong academically, I take part in 3 sports, and I am in the concert band, marching band, and indoor winds program. Like Bobby, I have also taken 3 years of French with Mr. C. My name is Nathanael Obrzut and I am planning on going to a 4 year college after I graduate high school to study zoo science and be a part of the school’s wrestling team.

Although I am in 3 sports, which are wrestling, football, and track and field, my favorite is wrestling. In the 2023-2024 season I won my first district championship and I plan to win it again in the 2024-2025 season. In the band, I also consider myself a jack of all trades because I know how to play multiple instruments. Doing all these different activities, I wouldn’t call myself a master of any of them because there is always something I can improve on. I do all of these activities because I like to keep busy all year round.

The other half of the saying is “though oftentimes better than master of one”. I agree with this statement. Some people focus solely on one thing and make their whole life about it. While that has the potential to be a good thing, I feel like there are a lot of things that those people are missing out on. I feel like they also narrow down their sights on what they want to do in life and might get bored or lose a love for the subject.

In all, A jack of all trades may be master of none, but will be more well rounded than the master of one, and I feel like this applies to me because I try to learn a little bit of everything and take part in a little bit of everything just like Bobby did in school.
